A case very closely analogous to that here described has been published by Professor Sgrossos, of Naples. In his case, however, the cysticercus was not discovered complete, but only the hooklets, while another point of difference between the two was the presence of pus in the one (Sgrossos) and not in the other. Meyer concludes his paper with a brief reference to the question, already much discussed, as to whether the cysticercus produces its inflammatory effect by means of infectious germs which find an entrance with it, or by the irritating chemical action of the substances which it secretes. He adheres to the latter view, at least in the present case, and remarks in passing, that in his opinion the inflammation resulting from intra-ocular cysticercus is generally set up in this way. N.
