And I certainly hope you will be able to, replied Jacob Farnum, cordially. This builder, a young man in his thirties, allowed a shade of uneasiness to flit across his face. However, when Don is in command of the boat, continued Mr. Melville, things will doubtless be run on a better system. That is, if we should decide to invest the money and place Don on board as captain. Your son inquired Jacob Farnum, with a quick note of astonishment in his voice. Certainly, continued Mr. Melville, in the easy voice of one who is sure of his ground. If my friends and myself decide to invest the required several hundred thousand dollars in your business, the first step of the reorganization on a broader basis will be the placing of my son in command of your boat. Hm! murmured Jacob Farnum. Don is wholly fitted for learning the work that I have cut out for him, pursued Mr. Melville. He has frequently taken command of my steam yacht, the Greyhound, and my sailing master, Captain Carson, assures me that Don is not only a splendid sailor, but born to command. So, after a little time spent in mastering details, Don will make the ideal captain for the Pollard. I have a very capable young man in charge now, said Mr. Farnum. Captain Jack Benson has already done a few things with the boat that have astonished Naval officers. How old is this fellow Benson inquired Mr. Melville. Sixteen. Only sixteen queried Mr. Melville, in a voice of amazement. Bah! He is entirely too young to be entrusted with the hopes of such a great boat-building company as...
